Elephant Trainer In Fair Condition After Attack

EAST MEADOW, N.Y. (UPI) — A 31-year old animal trainer was in fair condition at a hospital today with multiple injuries received when his circus elephant whipped and stamped on him before 3,000 spectators.

Eric Frodelius, the trainer, was treated for numerous broken bones and a head injury at a hospital today after he was attacked Saturday when he was backed up without warning by Jewel, a bull elephant.

He was leading the animal into a ring at the Wirth Circus in West Hempstead when the 40-year old elephant suddenly swung his trunk and knocked the trainer to the ground. The 6,000 pound animal then stomped on Frodelius, first with one front foot and then the other, while persons in the audience realizing what was happening started to scream.

Attendees rushed in and forced the elephant back with goods while others dragged Frodelius off.

Circus officials said it was not yet decided whether they would have to destroy the animal, which had never given any trouble before. Frodelius had been his trainer for 10 years.

Man In Space

Amateur Astronomers Prove To Be A Help To Space Program

by LAWRENCE R. WERNER
United Press International

PITTSBURGH (UPI) — "Moonwatchers" and other amateur astronomers are busy helping to hasten the day when the United States will send a man into orbit around the earth.

Thousands of volunteer astronomers — members of the Astronomical League — are supplying the Smithsonian Institution with valuable data used in satellite orbit computation.

Mrs. Wilma Cherup of Pittsburgh, the Astronomy League's executive secretary, reported recently that "Moonwatch teams vary in size from 12 persons to 20 or more. Tracking stations are equipped with wide-angle telescopes, many of them built by league members, and tape recorders with a radio attachment for receiving signals."

Helps Young Students

Mrs. Cherup said one of the most satisfying results of participating in the league's activities, apart from aiding the government in the space program, is watching students take an active interest in astronomy and science.

Although professionals have taken up much of the slack since 1957, Moonwatch teams are still of considerable use in the present space program.

"It would be impossible to calculate the contributions of the league in terms of money or time savings," said Mrs. Cherup. "The professionals relied on the Moonwatchers for a good while before they could take over themselves, and they still need their information."

She concluded, "You have to crawl before you can walk."

Goheen And Seay Sign At Murray State

Bennie Goheen and Gary Seay, who played for First Regional Champion North Marshall, have signed grants-in-aid with Murray State College. Coach Cal Luther has announced.

Goheen, a 6-2 guard-forward scored 470 points for the high-flying Jets this season, and was named the All-Regional team. He was on the All-Purchase second team last year and is a leading choice for the first team this year.

Seay, although only 6-1, was one of the top rebounders in the area, averaging close to 20 a game. A forward, he scored 500 points during the season. He too was a member of the All-Regional team and is a top choice for All-Purchase.

Both players scored in double figures in 32 of North Marshall's 35 games. Seay ranked third in the region in scoring, Goheen fourth.

Charlie Lamplie, a former player at Murray State, and one of the most successful coaches in Kentucky, is coach at North Marshall. Two years ago his Jets were state champions. This season, his team put together a sparkling 30-5 record.

Russia Will Give Answer To Cease Fire Proposal Soon

WASHINGTON (UPI) — President Kennedy and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko discussed the Laotian crisis for an hour today and then issued separate statements expressing hope of a peaceful settlement.

Gromyko said they discussed the possibility of a cease fire in war-torn Laos.

The White House said Kennedy "continues to be hopeful that there will be agreement between the parties concerned which will permit a cessation of hostilities and a development of a neutral and independent Laos."

Gromyko told reporters he stated to Kennedy the position of Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev on a cease fire.

Asked about the degree to which the cease fire question figured in the meeting, White House press secretary Pierre Salinger said: "The Soviet foreign minister indicated that the Soviet government is studying the British cease fire proposals and will make an answer to them in the very near future." Gromyko said he explained to Kennedy "certain considerations" on the part of Khrushchev with regard to a truce in Laos today.

Some Strings Attached?

Use of the word "considerations" indicated Khrushchev may be attaching some strings to any Russian acceptance of Britain's proposal for a cease fire, a truce team and an international conference.

Kennedy was understood to be firm in insisting that the Soviets help bring about a cease fire in Laos as the first step in any diplomatic settlement. Officials said a halt in the fighting was the "essential precondition" to the holding of an international conference on Laos.

Gromyko said he and the President agreed on the desirability of a "peaceful" settlement in Laos and the development of a government there under a "policy of neutrality."

Gromyko told reporters: "The President and I after our conversations, express the hope that possibilities will be found of settling the Laotian question peacefully."

Gromyko and Kennedy, flanked by their advisers around the fireplace in the President's office, discussed the possibility of a cease fire in Laos, but Gromyko declined to disclose the position of the Soviet government.

"I have nothing to say publicly on this," the Soviet foreign minister said.

However, Gromyko did say under questioning by reporters, that he conveyed to Kennedy the feelings of Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev on the cease fire question.

A U. S. version of what happened in today's meeting was expected shortly.

No Cease Fire Comment

Gromyko said the President and he both were hopeful of finding a way to settle the problem which would lead to "the peaceful development of Laos" and formulation of a "policy of neutrality" for that tiny kingdom.

Gromyko said it "would be good if both countries" worked "in that direction."

Asked whether they talked about a "cease fire," Gromyko said "we touched on this subject in the conversation but I have nothing to say publicly."

The Russian said he put forward, with respect to the cease fire, "certain considerations on the part of my government" and on behalf of Khrushchev.

Gromyko went to the White House at 11:55 a. m. His conference with Kennedy broke up at 12:56 p. m.

As Gromyko arrived for his critical meeting with the President, there were indications that Khrushchev might be trying to avoid a military showdown in Southeast Asia.

Gromyko, the first high Soviet government official to meet with Kennedy, pulled up at the White House at 11:55 a. m. (EST).

Hours preceding his arrival the Russians had broken their long silence on Laos by means of an editorial in Pravda which said Khrushchev favors "peace talks" to settle the most explosive dispute in the world today.

This was Pravda's comment on the U. S. - backed British proposals calling for a negotiated settlement of the Laotian question.

Silent On Big Issue

But the Communist party organ was silent on the most critical Western demand — that the Communists accept a cease fire in Laos as the first condition toward a peaceful settlement.

Giving the first indication of the official Soviet attitude, Pravda said the Russians favor peace talks on Laos, followed by convening of a 14-nation conference, including Red China, and reactivation of the old three-power Laos control commission.

The British note, however, had proposed first a cease fire, then reactivation of the control commission to see that the cease fire actually was observed, and then finally the international conference.

Kennedy conferred with Adlai E. Stevenson, U. S. ambassador to the United Nations, 40 minutes before the meeting with Gromyko.

Kennedy headed into his White House meeting with Gromyko backed by new pledges of Allied unity obtained over the weekend. These made it plain the free world would insist Russia stop fueling the fires that threaten an independent, neutral Laos.

CHAPTER 25

HE COULDN'T tell dead is silent when the Honorable C. Matthew Arnold District Attorney strode in stern and businesslike. He settled at a large table, unimpeded his broad shoulders, and he looked at the center of the table.

Wally Googins and Jane McPhips saw it at the same instant. It was Jane's notebook. Wally looked at her, grinned crookedly and sighed aloud. "My pen pal."

Jane shivered a little at that but managed a stoic smile. The Honorable Timothy X. O'Malley, Judge, walked in while looking at his watch, a fat gold timepiece with a hinged cover which he snapped shut.

Representing the Defendant was the Honorable Justin R. Tully.

Twelve citizens were seated in the jury box and in view of the defendant's personality Jane was gratified to see that nine of the twelve were women.

At a signal from the bench both attorneys squared off to declare themselves ready. The defendant's plea of Not Guilty was formally filed, the court plaintiffs were sworn in as a body and as Jane's blood congealed slightly, Gertrude Green was asked to step forward as first witness.

Hoping to set a perfect example for the girls, Miss Green had asked the D.A. to take her first, and she was impressive. She answered briefly, in well-rounded tones, and most willingly. But since she had never purchased any Canadian Countess, her testimony was utterly useless to the prosecution.

Then it was Jane's turn. As she mounted the witness stand, the mere thought of her big idea made her go blank, and she looked at the menacing figure of the District Attorney as if she'd never seen him before.

"He asked the expected questions, and then: 'Calling your attention to approximately October of last year did you have occasion to talk with the defendant?'"

"Yes," Jane answered. "Did the defendant mention to you a certain security by the name of Canadian Countess?"

"Yes." "Now will you tell the court, as nearly as you can recall, exactly what the defendant told you about Canadian Countess?"

Now was the moment, and Jane could almost feel as a tangible force the girl's support as she leaned forward to give proper emphasis to her words. Her eyes brightened with eagerness to tell her story and her lips formed words as she plunged ahead, rapid fire. But

The District Attorney looked sharply at her looked up at the Judge, who was not alert, said to his witness. "Will you repeat that louder?"

She went through it again, this time adding gestures. But still her voice was too faint to be heard.

The District Attorney leaned toward her. "Will you speak louder, that the court may hear you?"

Smiling apologetically, Jane said distinctly, "I'm sorry, I shall try." She cleared her throat. "As I was saying . . ."

Her sound box shut off again, while the lips went on. She was smiling encouragement to the D.A. when he shut her off with a shout.

"Louder, louder — that the court may hear you!"

Steepling a look at the Judge, who was totally absorbed in examining the nail of his little finger, Jane murmured, "Sir, may I ask you to repeat the question?"

The District Attorney eyed her balefully, opened his mouth, glanced uneasily at the Judge and then closed his mouth. What with a Judge distracted by a torn nail and with a difficult witness, he had forgotten his question. Finally he looked at the court reporter to read it.

The reporter stood and read in a monotone.

"Now will you tell the court, as nearly as you can recall, exactly what the defendant told you about Canadian Countess?"

"Oh, yes, indeed." Deciding to witness the jury directly, Jane thought she'd better speak firmly for a change. "Mr. Googins told me he was with a firm interested in special situations. Many of them were wonderful. I was impressed. He was trailed off, and nobody heard anything more."

The District Attorney, noting the Judge's frown, quickly decided to change his pace. After all, he'd known this Judge to not right off in open court. Walking to his table, he picked up Jane's notebook and addressed the Judge.

"Counsel has inspected this, your Honor. May I have this marked — the People's Exhibit Number One for identification?"

The Judge nodded sagely. "It may be so marked." Turning back to Jane, the District Attorney begged, "Now, will you tell the court about your purchases of Canadian Countess?"

"Let purchases," Jane corrected him. "A single purchase."

"All right! But let's hear about it!"

SUBROC-U, S. Navy

By JAMES H. WINCHESTER
Central Press Association Writer

An anti-submarine warfare weapon, the new guided missile known as SUBROC is now under development for the U. S. Navy by the Goodyear Aircraft Corporation.

Fired from a submerged submarine torpedo tube, the SUBROC missile goes up through the surface of the water and through the air to its target, then re-enters the water to seek out the enemy submarine, much like a conventional torpedo.

The SUBROC system, expected to be ready for operational testing sometime in 1961, is designed to detect a submarine at long range, compute its course and speed, and fire the missile. It provides ranges greatly in excess of present anti-submarine torpedoes.

No exact details or specifications have been announced for the SUBROC, although it is expected to be in the same category as the ASROC system, an anti-submarine missile system introduced by the Navy in 1960, which is fired from surface vessels. The ASROC is a 1,000-pound, 15-foot-long rocket, can carry either a conventional or nuclear warhead.

It is known that when the SUBROC torpedo is ready to re-enter the water, after its flight through the air, the rocket body will drop away, the torpedo and warhead will drop back into the water, a 40-foot parachute will be used then to lower this charge into the sea from its flight trajectory.

Cincinnati Coach Thrilled But Taylor Calls It A "Stupid" Game That Resulted In Ohio's Loss Of Its National Crown

By DON SWENSON

United Press International
KANSAS CITY, Mo. (UPI) — Strategy which mistimed in the final two seconds of regulation play may have cost Ohio State's Buckeyes the 1961 NCAA basketball championship.

With the score tied, 61-61, and two seconds remaining on the clock, Ohio State called time out with the ball under the Buckeye basket. Ohio State captain Larry Siegrist passed deep to John Havlicek, who again called time out — this time with one second remaining.

Ohio State strategy called for a high arching pass in from Havlicek. The ball was supposed to hit the rim of the basket so All-American Jerry Lucas could tip it in.

The ball hit the rim, but Lucas wasn't there. He had been unable to get around 6-9 Cincinnati center Paul Hogue and the ball bounded away free as the buzzer sounded.

Cincinnati scored nine points in the overtime to nail down its first national title, 70-65.

Tags Game "Stupid"

Ohio State Coach Fred Taylor called it a "stupid game."

He said the Buckeyes could have won "the stupid game" if they had taken advantage of their leads, and he cited that they were ahead by as much as seven points in the first half "and later we led by as much as five."

Jucker singled out guards Tony Yates and Carl Bouldin. "Their outside shooting and tremendous defensive work distorted Ohio State's pattern, and it (Ohio State) wasn't able to get into its regular offense."

Yates sank three free throws in the overtime period, and Bouldin contributed 11 points in the first eight minutes of the second half to fire up the Cincinnati attack.

Paces Bearcats

The 42-year old Cincinnati coach, who said his entire team played great ball, also heaped individual praise on burly Bob Wiesenhahn. The husky, stalking forward led Bearcat scorers with 17 points, was their leading rebounder with nine, and held Ohio State forward John Havlicek to one field goal.

Not only did Cincinnati dethrone Ohio State as national champion, but it snapped the Buckeyes' 32-game winning streak. In the process, Cincinnati extended its winning streak to 22 games.

The championship game was a fitting climax to an action-packed night, which saw St. Joseph's (Pa.) outlast Utah, 127-120, in four overtime periods for third place in the tournament.

John Egan scored 42 points and little James Lynam had 31 for St. Joseph's and Utah's Billy McGill scored 34 in the marathon which shattered four NCAA scoring records, tied another, and consumed an extra hour of play time.

included: most points scored by two teams in a single game (247), most points scored by a team in a single game (127 by St. Joseph's and 120 by Utah); most points scored by a team in a single season of NCAA tournament playoffs (Utah 366 and St. Joseph's 364), and most field goals (Utah 50 and St. Joseph's 45).

In addition, the four-overtime game tied an NCAA tourney mark. Only other playoff game to last that long was the 1956 contest between Canisius and North Carolina State, won by Canisius.

Ohio State and Cincinnati dominated the all-tournament team, each with two selections.

Lucas was the only unanimous choice. He was joined by teammate Siegrist, Cincinnati's Bouldin and Wiesenhahn, and Egan of St. Joseph's on the first team. Second team selections were Utah's McGill, Ohio State's Havlicek, Cincinnati's Tom Thacker and Yates, and Lynam of St. Joseph's.
